House Nichols

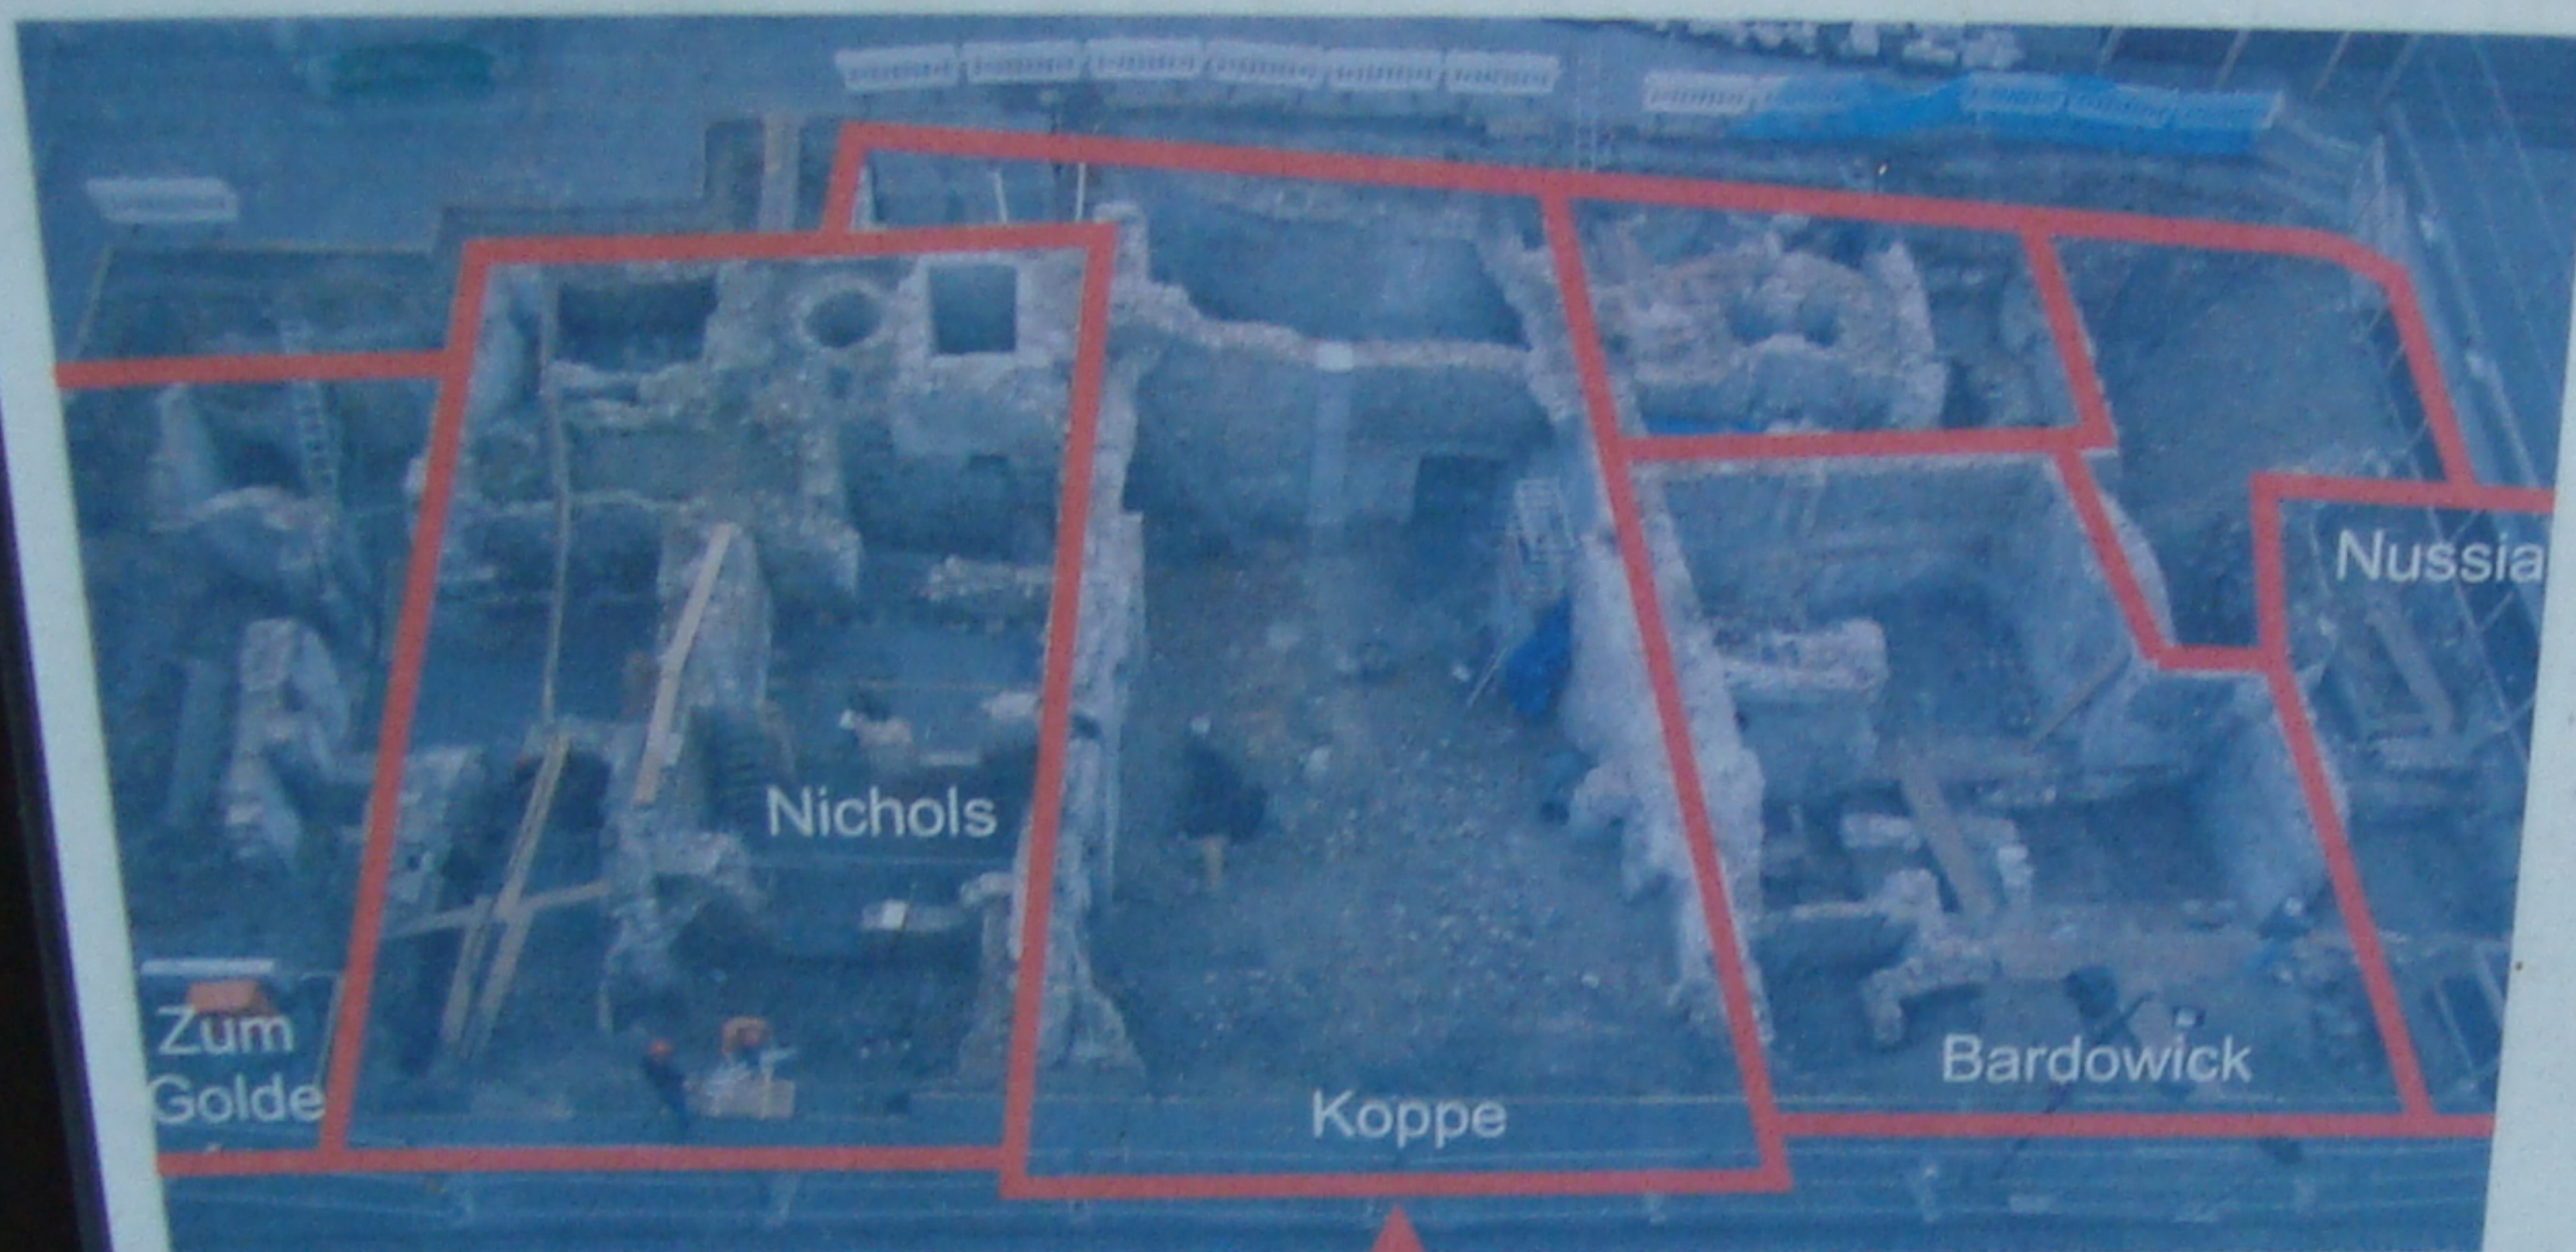

Although goldsmith Theoderich von Metz is one of the first known owners of the house in the middle of the 12th century, it is named after goldsmith Nicholas, who lived here in the middle of the 13th century. The Jewish community acquired the house in 1288, but sold the front part of it to Franco de Cornu in 1295. The rear building was kept and converted into a Jewish bakery that persisted until the Pogrom of 1349, when almost the entire Jewish population of Cologne was murdered.

The walled up round-arch door is likely to be a testimony of the separation of the house in 1295. The house has not yet been excavated completely. On the right side one can still see rooms from the 19th century. The floors are notably higher than those of the other surrounding houses.

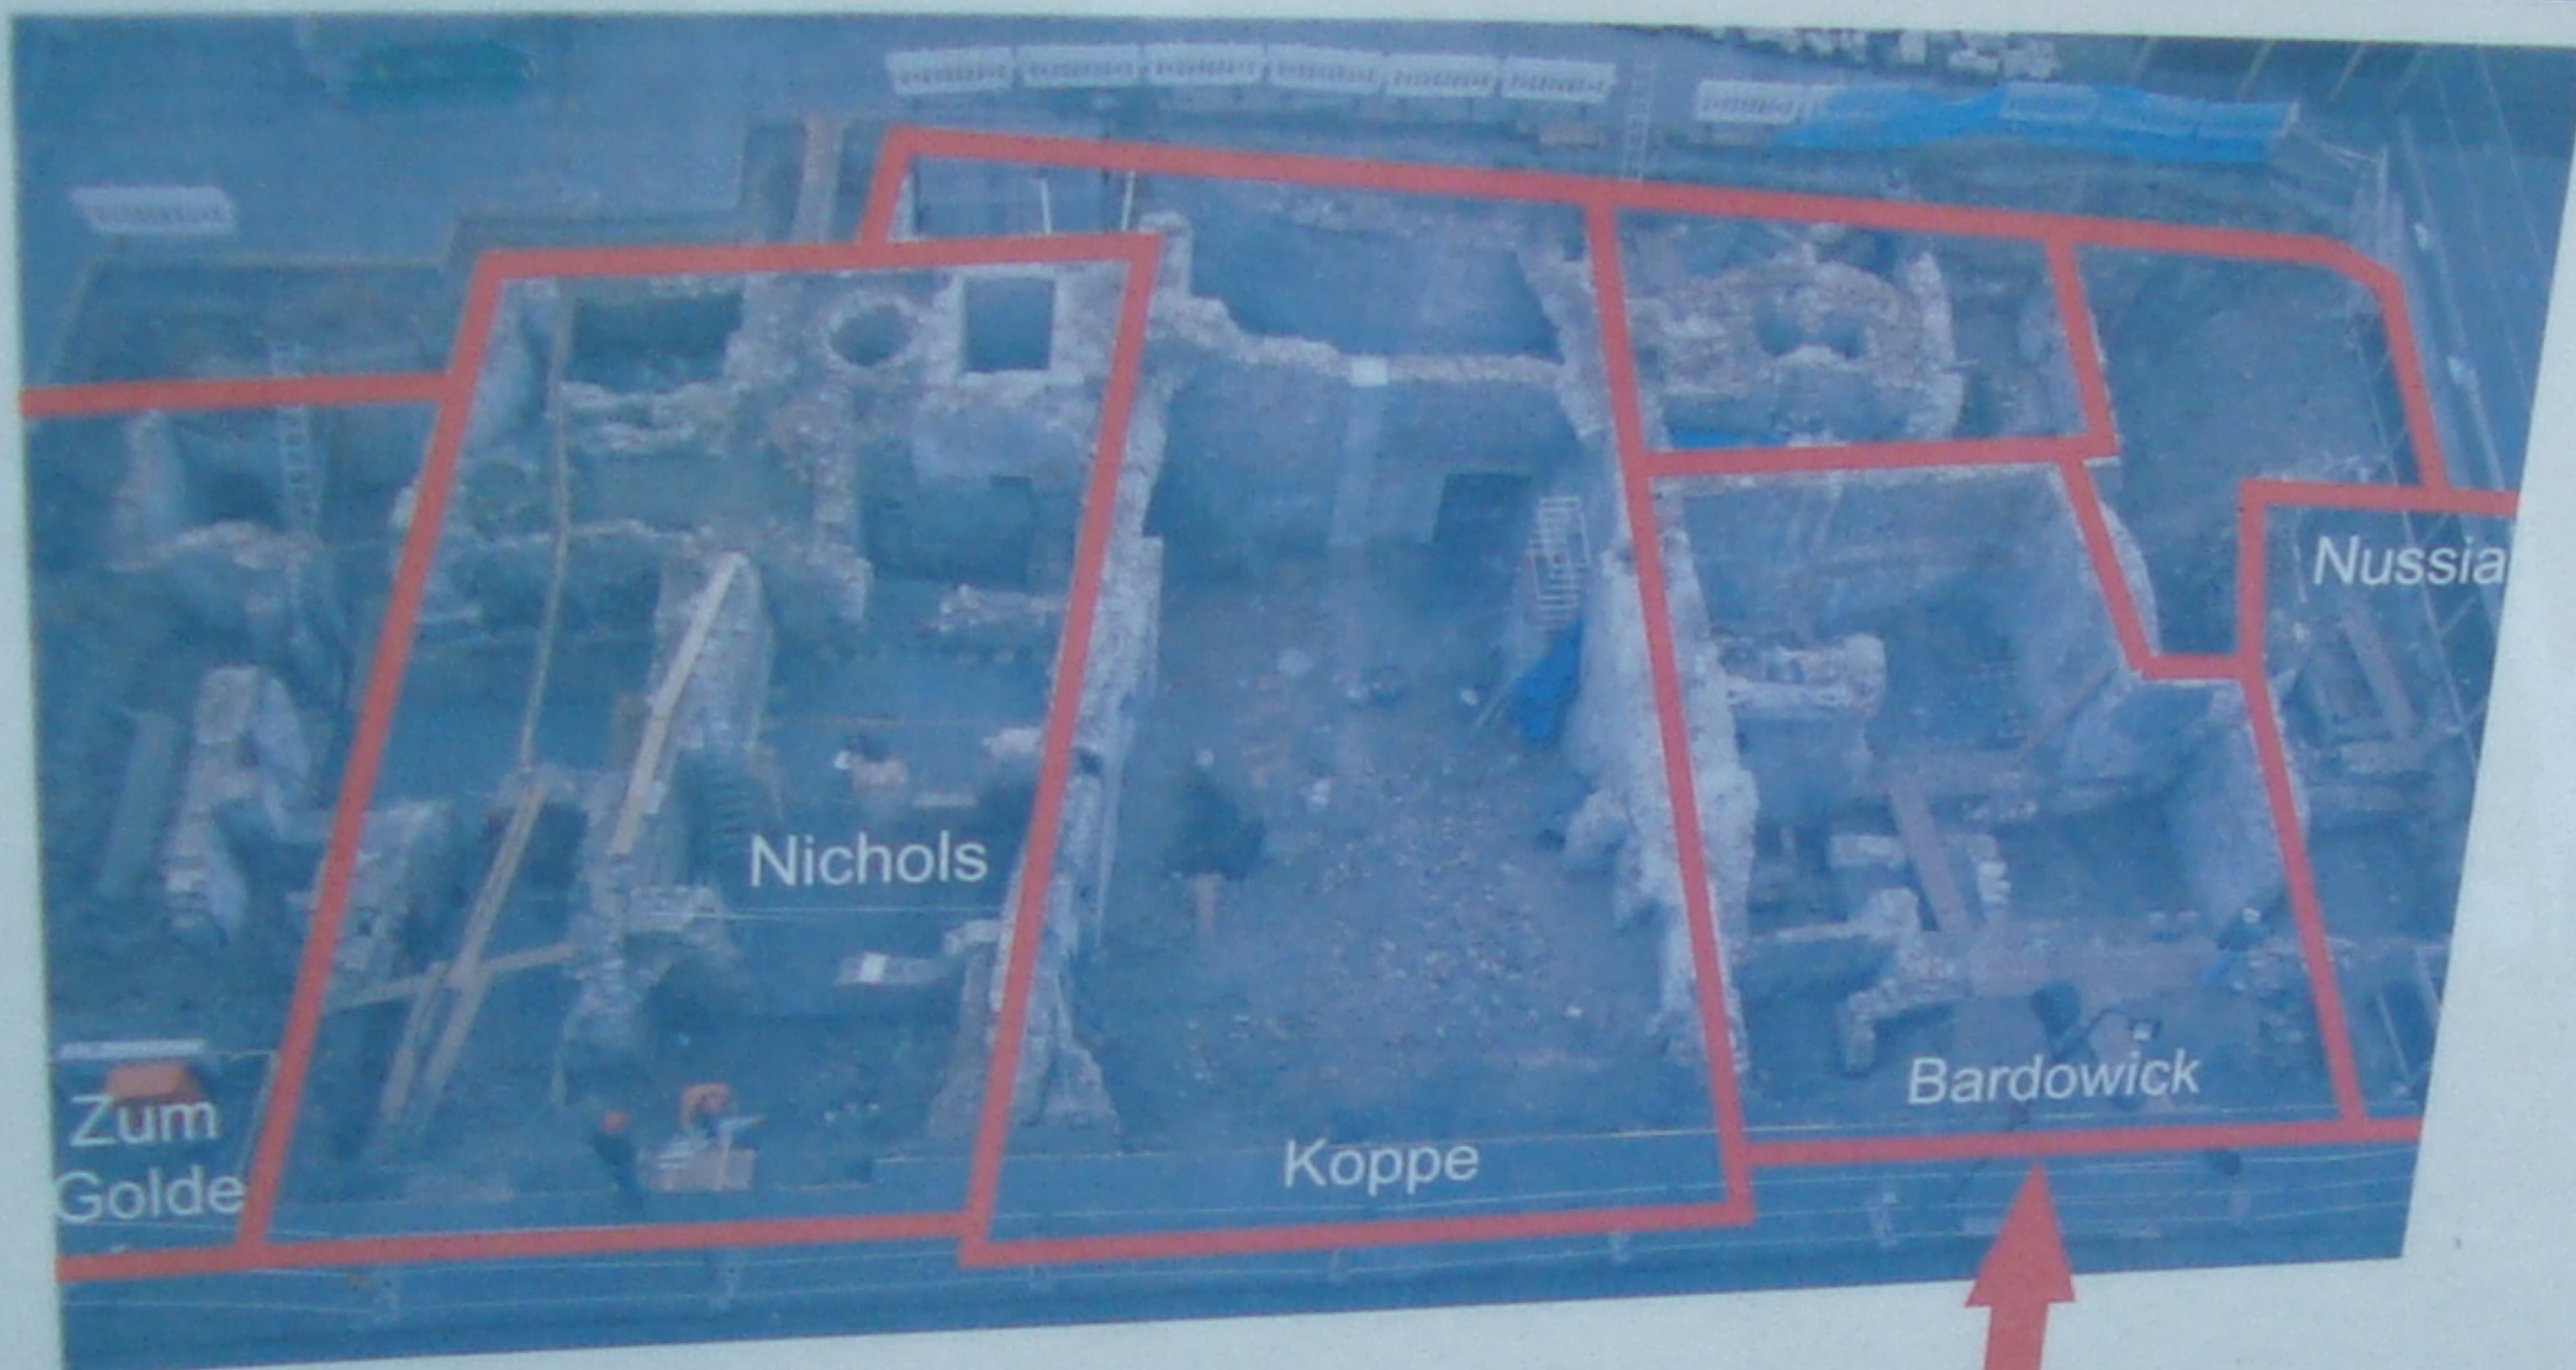

House Koppe

Particularly impressive is the cellar of House Koppe with its Romanesque tufa-stone arches (12th century, right side) and a pillar (14th century) made of volcanic rock from the Drachenfels (found in the Siebengebirge Mountains near Bonn). Whereas this pillar survived locked inside a partition wall that was inserted later, the other pillars carrying the two-nave vault were removed during remodelling of the building.

House Koppe was one of the large Romanesque houses in Cologne and can almost be compared with the "Overstolzenhaus", the largest preserved patrician house in Cologne. House Koppe existed until the middle of the 19th century, when it was demolished and replaced by a new building. The vault will be restored and made accessible underground.

House Bardowick

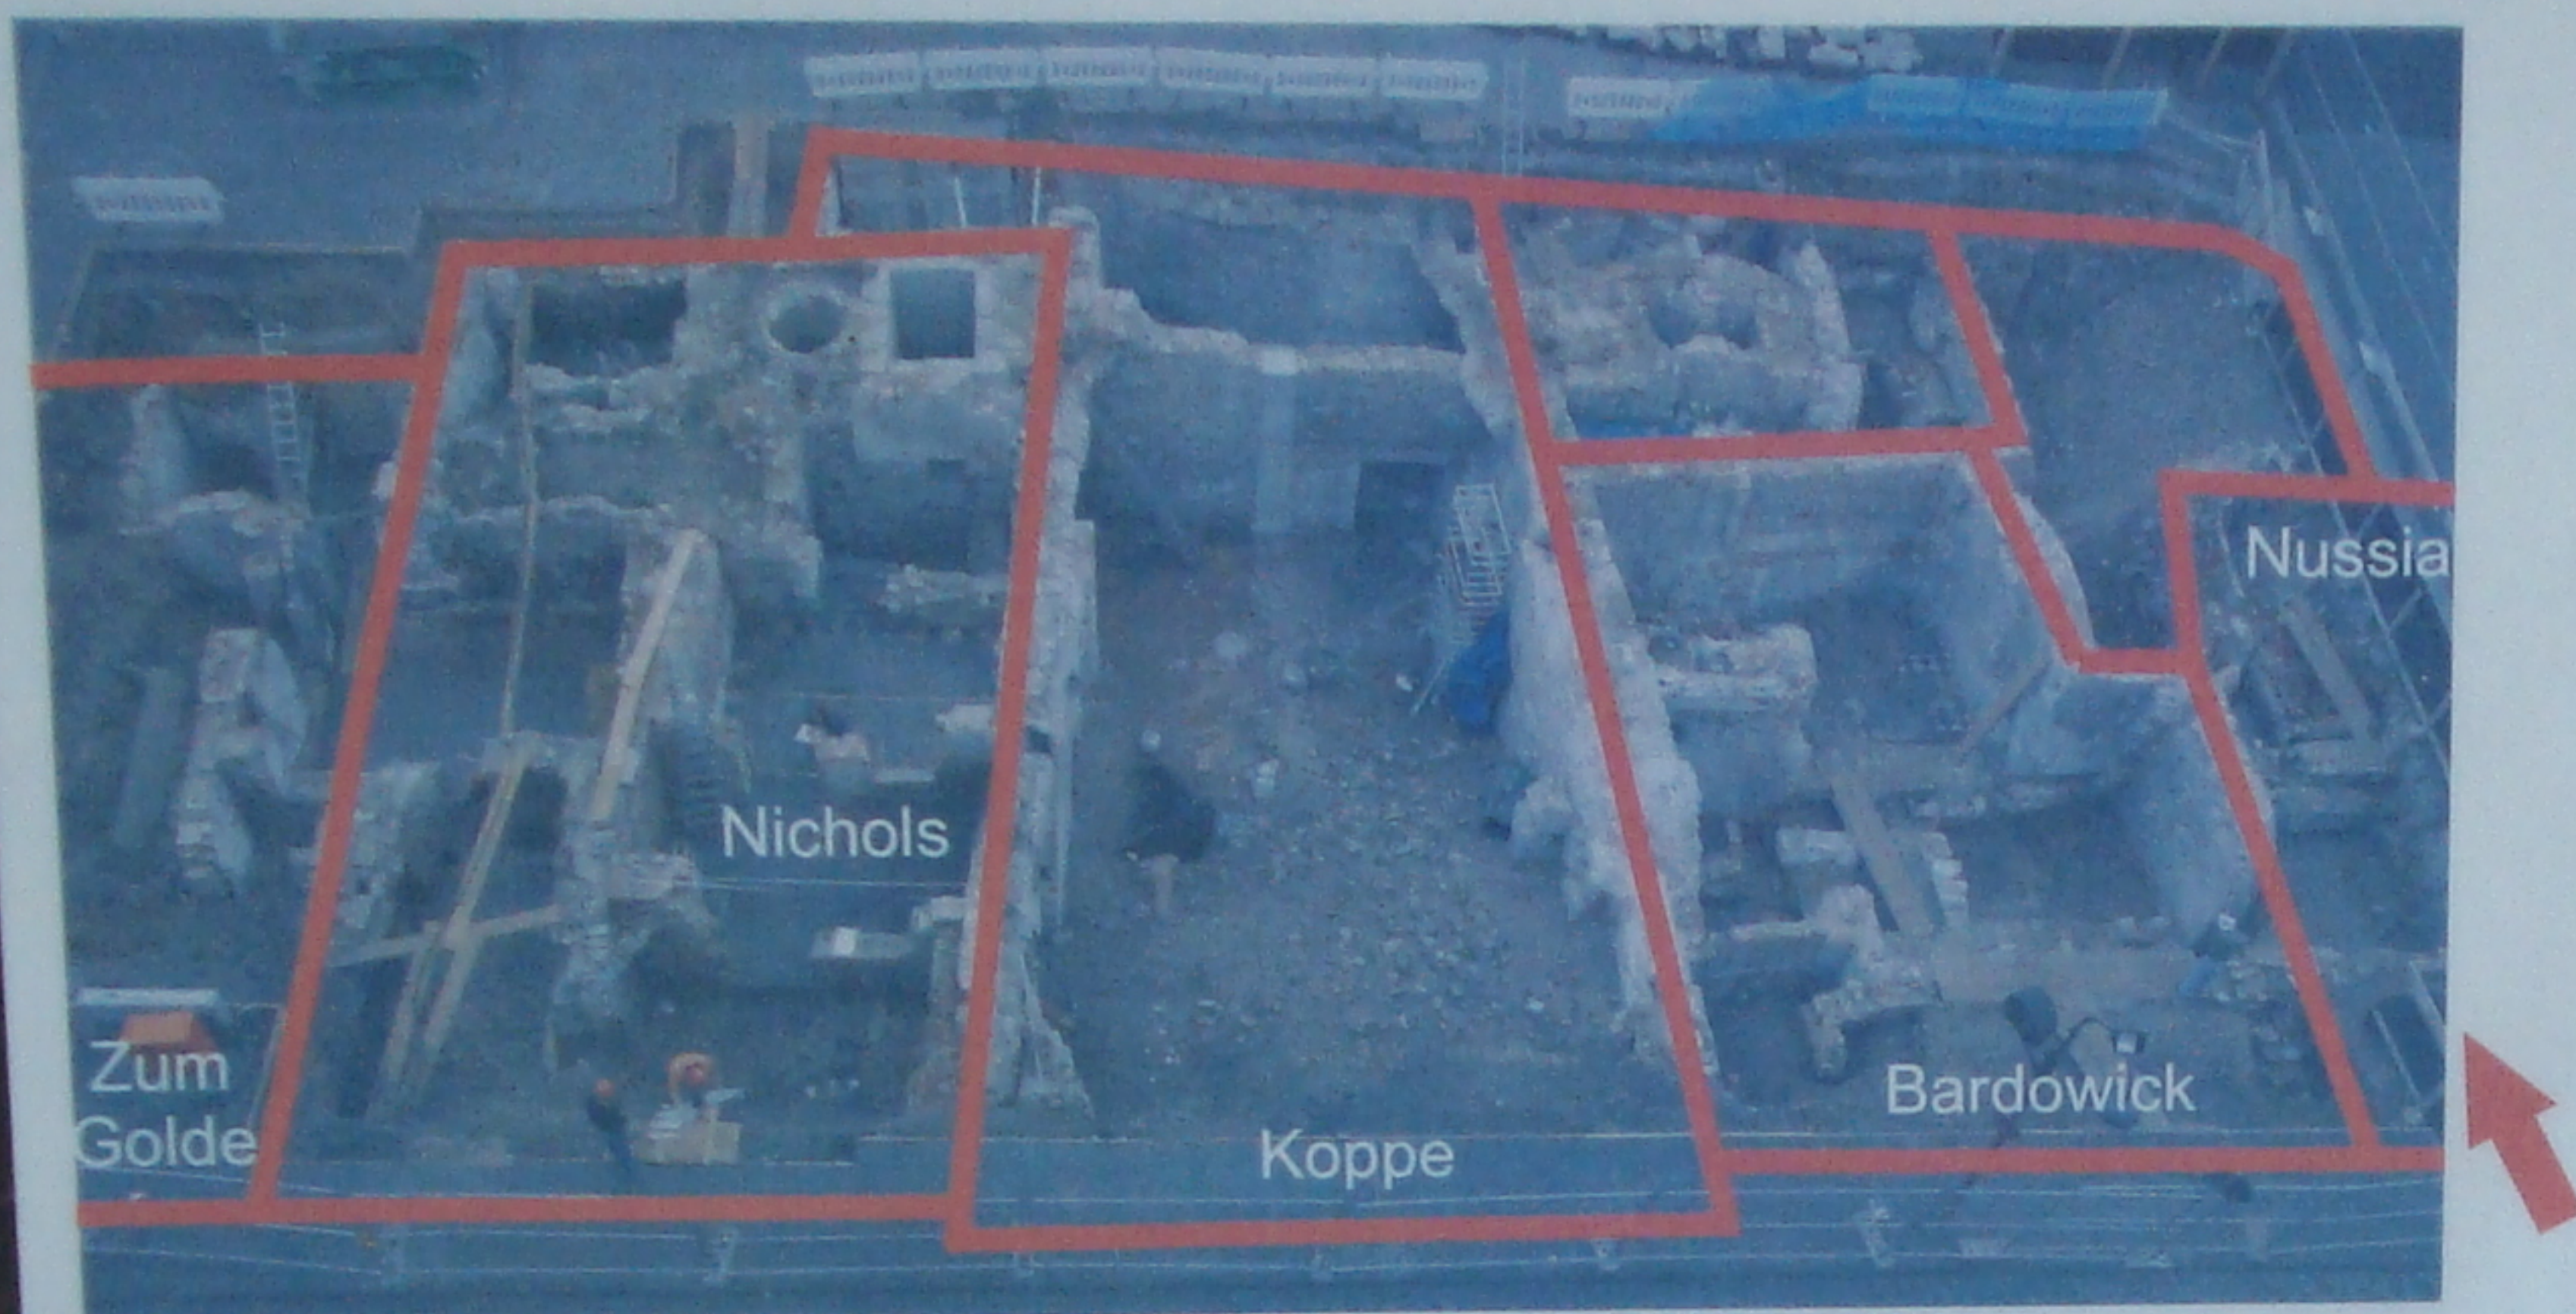

Before 1200 AD, this house may have served as the first guild house for goldsmiths. It was named after Johannes de Bardewich who bought the house around 1200 AD. In the 14th and 15th centuries it was referred to as a department store or "yarn house". In addition, the privy in the backyard with its two seats is mentioned and was also used by the House of the Trappen in the street "Judengasse". Thus, both houses shared the cleaning costs.

The Roman remains are particularly extraordinary: on the left, one can see large tufa-stone blocks from the first century; in the back, a large brick structure is visible behind which is located a floor with a Roman hypocaust heating; in the centre on the left, one can spot a Roman arch locked inside the wall. It is covered with a Roman floor plaster on which the remains of a further storey with an octagonal water basin can still be made out.

House Nussia

This house is named after Gottfried de Nussia (from Neuss) and was first mentioned in the written sources between 1170 and 1182. Back then, the house was already separated. Before Gottfried and his wife Elisabeth purchased the second half of the house between 1189 and 1200 from the Jew Mannus and his wife, only one part of it belonged to Elisabeth. Currently, most of the house is still covered by the street. In the "Judengasse", other remains can be identified that are largely of Roman substance.
